College of Human Ecology Highlights Graduate Studies During November 14 Information Session

New Certificate of Advanced Studies in Addiction Studies Now Available

Syracuse University faculty and current students will welcome potential graduate students interested in addiction studies, child and family studies, marriage and family therapy, nutrition science and dietetics, and social work during the College of Human Ecology's Fall Information Session on Saturday, November 14 at 11:00 a.m. in Lyman Hall. Free parking is available.

Detailed information will also be available on the new Certificate of Advanced Studies (CAS) in Addiction Studies. This academic program is designed to support working professionals and supplement undergraduate and graduate study. According to the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, substance abuse and behavioral disorder counselors are one of the fastest-growing fields of practice today.

Admissions staff will be available at the information session to meet with students and provide information on academic programs, scholarships and housing. For more information about this event, and to RSVP for it, contact 315.443.5555 or e-mail HumanEcology@syr.edu.

About the College of Human Ecology at Syracuse University

The College of Human Ecology is dedicated to excellence in professional academic education and integrates Scholarship in Action as a philosophy and method in all of its degree programs. The college brings together a rich history of academic programs whose signatures of social responsibility and justice join new and evolving majors reflective of educating global citizens whose leadership can—and does—change the places and people where they live and work.

Previously known as the College of Human Services and Health Professions until it was renamed in 2007, the College of Human Ecology hosts seven departments with strong roots in Syracuse University history. They are the Child and Family Studies; Health and Wellness; Hospitality Management; Marriage and Family Therapy; Nutrition Science and Dietetics; Sport Management; and the School of Social Work.
